**Ollie** - The little man is just over two months now. It's been a challenging two months, but compared to how things **could** be with a toddler, he's very reasonable. He's had some troubles latching onto Marija's breasts, and we've recently learned it's because he has a type 3 (modest) tongue tie. At least that's what our most recent lactation consultant thinks. He's also quite 'tight' and curls his body in a consistent direction - something we're going to address (hopefully) with physio.

Other than that, he's lovely. He's very cute, and is starting to talk and smile more and more. When I say talk, I mean in his own way of course. He's playing with different sounds, and we're all waiting with bated breath to see if he's gotten David Hedlin or kissy cheeks (Cheryl) genetics. We're going to the Bloor Kids health center to double check to make sure his eye movement during breast feeding isn't a symptom of something serious (Marija's noticed his eyes shake from side to side sometimes).

Life is tiring, but we wouldn't have it any other way. I work in the basement (SSENSE) during the day, and can hear him through the audio monitors. I start missing him, so I often go upstairs. When I do, I'm inevitably given some task, so I again retreat.

Ollie continues to keep us guessing in the night. We're settling into a routine, and in an effort to keep the universe in balance, he fights it. His last feed is around 7-8pm. He then sleeps until 12-1:30... usually. He receives another feed, and then sleeps until 4am-5am. This seems structured, however, each night is an unpredictable peppering of grunts, cries, and murmurs during the time he should be sleeping. We strap him into the snoo (which has been a godsend), and although he entertains the straps for a short while, we can soon hear him grunting as if he's flexing his entire body in an effort to escape.

He's started sucking on his hands. A lot. Our google search histories now include things along the lines of "how much hand sucking is too much for a 2 month old".

I had a dentist appointment today, and the ladies in the office thought he was very cute. I wasn't sure I would have kids in this life, and I certainly never thought I would be showing photos of my kid to a room full of people, unsolicited.

It's now 5:30pm, and Ollie is up. With monitors spread throughout the house, it's hard to plead ignorance and not help. I'll make my way up to see the gang (although I'm sure I would have been called either way).
